THE PARISH OF MOUNT HAWKE

Towl Bedhcryvow Kernow

Numerous plaques, burial ground headstones, foundation stones and formal monuments record the lives or actions of both the famous and successful as well as the ordinary person. By far the most numerous of these will be found in burial grounds, others will be located on War Memorials; inscriptions are inevitably inscribed on foundation stones of public buildings; special plaques may be erected to record an heroic or notable event or birth place; there are prominent monuments to the rich or extraordinary such as the Bassett Monument on Carn Brea or the Lander statue at the top of Lemon Street in Truro; churches and chapels as well as community buildings often have wall plaques. The majority will date from the past three hundred years but some will be very old, such as a few ancient crosses from the seventh/eight centuries recording a chieftain or important person of that time.

Written records such as parish baptism, marriage and death registers, diaries, deeds, court, taxes and voting records and numerous other "paper" records are, in varying degrees of efficiency, preserved and recorded by the County Records Office and museums and transcribed, indexed and published by local historians and societies. However, numerous records of the people of Cornwall may also be found on stone, slate, marble, wood and metal. Some of these (particularly in burial grounds) have been recorded but usually in index form without a full transcript. Maps indicating locations within a burial ground are virtually nonexistent. There are several reasons why many monuments have been destroyed or can no longer be read. The reuse of burial grounds, general tidying up and maintenance or lack of careful maintenance, the closure of hundreds of places of worship are just some types of accidental vandalism. Natural deterioration caused by wind and rain (especially acid rain), the effects of ice and the encroachment of vegetation are all contributing to a continuing loss.

CIP are surveying all Cornish memorials and creating an archive and database together with photographic records. The survey is being conducted parish by parish and there are 255 modern Cornish parishes within the Diocese of Truro. Various regions in the world to which the Cornish migrated are also being surveyed and Expatriate Registers are being produced. One means of disseminating the results of the survey is through a series of booklets based upon parishes and this booklet is part of that series.

The Parish Of Mount Hawke - Background

Within the ecclesiastical parish of Mount Hawke there are seven locations where memorial inscriptions may be found - The Cemetery; the Parish church of St John the Baptist; the War Memorial, the Methodist Chapel and the Men's Institute - all of these are located within the village of Mount Hawke - Ordnance Survey grid reference SW715475. Mawla Methodist chapel is located on the border with Treleigh Parish. The CIP survey of the parish was conducted during the early part of the year 2001 when 633 memorials were found and 1361 names recorded.

The parish of Mount Hawke was constituted in 1846, being carved out of the Southwest section of the parish of St Agnes and it covers 2420 acres with the west boundary following the rugged north Cornish coastline. Mount Hawke is the main village and other settlements include Wheal Rose, Skinner's Bottom, Manor Parsley, Menagissey, Lower Banns, Towan Cross, Mawla and the popular but small seaside resort of Porthtowan which lies at the head of a dramatically mined out valley.

It was not until 1876 that the parish had its own burial ground, before then interments generally took place at St Agnes. In January 1876 the St Agnes Burial Board purchased a piece of land from Messrs. E W B & A C P Willyams, measuring "one acre, three rods and 23 perches". Situated near a lane called Short Cross, the burial ground was known as Short Cross Cemetery for many years. The Board divided this parcel of land into three strips, the easterly section being consecrated for burials on 31st July 1877, the middle strip initially remaining "unappropriated" and the westerly strip being left unconsecrated and probably used for nonconformist interments. At this time a plan was drawn up setting out the proposed burial plots, there being 625 in the easterly section and 701 in the westerly side. At the end of each row appropriately numbered grave markers were laid down, many of which survive to this day. The duties of the Burial board were taken over by St Agnes parochial council and the central strip is now used for burials as well as incorporating a Garden of Remembrance.

At the time the cemetery and Garden of Rest inscriptions were surveyed there were 605 headstones, mentioning 1055 people. The earliest burial commemorated is dated January 27th 1877 (see ref. 364) and the latest is dated 20th May 2000. There are references on a few memorials to people who died before that date but who were not interred in this cemetery. It should be noted that before the cemetery was opened the people of Mount Hawke generally conveyed their dead to St Agnes and there are therefore references on the headstones to family members interred at that town where there are three burial grounds.

When Mount Hawke became a parish in 1846 a building in the village was used as the church (there is now no trace of this building). Eventually sufficient funds were raised to build a proper parish church, this was built adjacent and to the east of the cemetery, separated by a dry stone wall but accessible by a gate. The foundation stone of the church was consecrated on the same day as the cemetery and the new building was dedicated to St John the Baptist in 1878. Within this plain and simple church, which can accommodate 250 people, there are nine commemorative plaques which mention 182 people. Since 1995 Mount Hawke has been a United Benefice with the parishes of St Agnes and Mithians.

The parish War Memorial was erected just inside the main gates of the cemetery, screened by trees and bushes. Constructed from granite and surmounted by a Cornish cross, maintained by St Agnes Parish Council, it records five who gave their lives in the first world war and seven in the second. This should be compared with the Rolls of Honour for both wars located within the parish church and the Methodist chapel.

The Methodist Chapel was built in 1820 and contains four memorials and the Mount Hawke Men's Institute, built in 1888, it has two memorials.

The Methodist Chapel at the small hamlet of Mawla was constructed in 1908, interestingly, three of the twelve memorials within that chapel commemorate people who died before the chapel was built.

DISASTERS ON THE CORNISH COAST

Wreck and Loss of Life at Porthtowan

The terrific north-westerly gale which sprang up on Sunday night was productive of a tragic disaster, in the early hours of Monday morning, at Porthtowan, near St. Agnes. The north coast in the vicinity of Porthowan is particularly dangerous, the mile after mile of lofty, beetling cliffs being only broken here and there by stretches of flat, treacherous sand. All day on Sunday the waves broke with tremendous fury, and when the wind came more directly from the north, it was feared by those on the lookout that some vessel would come to grief. During the closing hours of Sunday night, however, no distress signals were seen, and it seemed that the numerous craft always running to and from ports of South Wales had been able to weather the gale.

Monday morning, however, had a lamentable tale of disaster and death to disclose. When Coast guard West who is stationed at Porthtowan, was on duty about six a.m. and the tide was nearing high water mark, he noticed, amongst the foam a ship's cistern. This left no room for doubt that a vessel had been wrecked, and, searching about in the dim light, he noticed the bodies of two men being driven before the waves on the side of the beach. Shortly after there were discovered among the rocks that stud the western side of the beach, four other bodies. All except one had on belts, bearing the name "Rose of Devon". While the bodies were being removed, large quantities of wreckage were driven in, and later there was observed, held fast in the sand, two hundred yards below high water mark, the remains of a barque. The bodies were conveyed to the house near the beach and searched, but nothing was discovered to suggest who they were. As the remains of the poor fellows lay beside one another they presented a melancholy sight. In neither case were the features disfigured to any extent, owing to the absence of rocks where they were driven in. Two were wearing oilskin coats, but the others had on only ordinary working garments.

When the tide receded, it was found that the vessel had broken in two, one half having been dashed to pieces, while the other half was held fast in the sand by the bow, which pointed seaward. Over the beach from one end to the other fragments of varying sizes were strewn, and these were eagerly collected by salvors, who flocked to the port through the morning. How the vessel came in is a mystery. The Coast guards declare that no distress signals were made off the coast during Sunday night, and further that no vessel's lights were seen in a position indicative of peril. The men who were about aver that so fierce was the gale that no lights could have been kept burning by a vessel of the size of the "Rose of Devon", and consequently they express no surprise that the barque was ashore before the coast guards were aware of the disaster, as the night was dark, and the extensive stretch of water would prevent objects being readily seen. It is also contented that had Coast guards West and Mitchell, who are stationed at Porthtowan, been aware of the vessel grounding, they could not have effected service with their apparatus as there was too long a stretch of broken water between. The "Rose of Devon" had a crew of eleven men, and there is no doubt that they all perished. None of them hailed from Cornwall.

The inquest on the six bodies was held by Mr. Laurance Carlyon on Tuesday, when a verdict of "Found Drowned" was returned. At the conclusion of the inquest a Juror suggested that the bodies should be removed from the outhouse in which they were then located, before any of the friends of the deceased arrived. Coast guard West said they could get the bodies removed into a house where there was a wooden floor..... He added that he and his colleagues knocked the door of the shed in which the bodies were every time they passed, in order to frighten the rats away. It is a very dirty place for friends from Guernsey to come and see. Coroner : I think they might be allowed to stay at least another day for identification. Coast guard West : We can put carbolic about, I don't know whether rats like that. The bodies are in good condition now, and could stay a day or two longer. Coroner : They must be put in shells whether they are moved or not. (To the police) : You see that that is done. I dare say the owners of the vessel will pay the expenses of the burial.
